District E-Mail Use by Staff

As the use of e-mail becomes more and more a core part of doing our jobs as teachers and support staff, it is important that we remember a few things about using the district e-mail system.

Any e-mail messages that pass through the district's e-mail server are considered property of the district. Because of this, the district administrators have every right to examine any and all e-mail messages that you send or receive using your district e-mail account.

Secondly, any e-mail messages that pass through the district's e-mail server are subject to the Open Records Laws that govern public institutions. Any citizen of your community can request copies of your e-mail messages. If such a request is made, the district must comply.

As you would expect, there are exceptions to the Open Records Law. For example, messages that contain information that is considered confidential in nature (specifically, student information or employee personnel records) can be held back. Otherwise, copies of all e-mail messages will be released when a request is made to the district.
